Comment: We sold our house this year on account of its proximity to a local airport which has increased its use of flight training over the years. The incremental impact of noticing something, and then committing to the idea that it's annoying you, and then being actually annoyed by it, is something that can be very hard to undo. I fear that a light touch federal regulatory approach to the impact of drone noise on, firstly, overall comfort and ambience of living, and secondly psychological disruption, will quickly evolve into a situation which is difficult to reverse once the market forces have their way.

Do we really need things buzzing around everywhere that mean less jobs for people and sound like prehistoric mosquitoes?
